THE RIFLE AND THE ROD.

By S. H. HAMMOND

Author of "Hills, Lakes and Youest Streams," etc.

From the Author's Preface.

The scenery I have attempted to describe—the lakes, rivers, mountains, islands rocks, valleys and streams, will be found as recorded in this volume.

I was over a portion of that wilderness last summer and found plerty of trout and abundance of deer. I heard the he wi of the woolf, the scream of the panther, and the hoarse beliow of the moose.

For myself, I have come to regard these mountains, those lakes and streams, these old forests, and all this wild region, as my settled anumer resort, instead of the discomforts, the jam, the excitement, and the unrest of the watering-places or the sea-shore. I visit them for their calm seclusion, their pure air, their natural cheerfulness, their transcendant beauty, their brilliant mornings, their glorious sunsets, their quiet and repose. I visit them too, because when among them, I can take off the armor which one is compelled to wear, and remove the watch which one must set over himself, in the crowded thoroughfares of life; because I can whistle, sing, shout, hurrah and be jelly, without seating the ridicule or ye ching the contempt of the world. In short, because I can who was a down to the days of all think, and act, and feel like a "a boy again."
